BOY BRIGADE

ROUTED REGULARS

Gen. Franz Sigel, grandfather of the girl whose body was found last week in a Chinaman's room in New York, numbered many acquaintances throughout the South, both among those who fought under him during the Civil War as well as many Confederate soldiers who met him during the strife between the States and between the end of the war and the time of General Sigel's death.

General Sigel's troops were largely made up of Germans, and the early successes of this German-American commander in the valley of Virginia led to a song which began as follows:

"I fight mit Sigel in der valley."
 Later General Sigel was selected to command the army which had as its object the destruction of all crops throughout the valley of Virginia, which at that time, about two years before the war, was the principal source of supplies for General Lee's army.

That General Sigel's march down the valley would have been a victorious one, but for the bravery of a few hundred little Southern boys, is now conceded by many authorities on the war. This handful of little soldiers were the cadets of the Virginia Military Institute, who with several commands, made of men too old to go to the front, and those convalescent from wounds received in battle, met Gen. Franz Sigel at New Market in the valley of Virginia, and won a victory which received the applause of not only the South, but the entire world.

The ages of these little cadets, whose ranks had been depleted by the loss of all the older boys, who had joined General Lee's army, ranged from fourteen to seventeen years. They were so young and agile that in the charge they got far ahead of the crippled old soldiers on their left and right, and while immediately in front of the enemy's artillery, they were commanded to halt and mark time until the right and left wings came up. There they remained in the face of a terrible fire of shrapnel and canister for some time, their ranks closing as fast as they were shot down, which was in conformity with the tactics of that day. This incident has not received from the historians the notice that it deserves, in spite of the fact that military writers declare that no troops in the history of the world had ever before halted and marked time in the face of a fire of shrapnel and canister, nor have any ever done so since then.

Finally the command came to again move forward, and the little fellows, or those that were left of them, charged

Andrew Carnegie has just given a million dollars to France, to be used for hero medals. Wonder if this million is some that was made out of the blood of the victims of the Bethlehem strike and massacres. Poor old cuss, he doesn't know what to do with the millions of money that the American people ground out of themselves and presented to him.

over the works and captured the guns which had played such havoc in their ranks. Soon Sigel's whole army was in confusion, and flight followed.

This battle resulted in a change in the song of General Sigel's troops, so that it began:

"I fight mit Sigel in der valley."
 "I runs mit Sigel, too!"—

SWATTING THE FLY.

Pensacola, June 26.—Restaurants, soda water stands, saloons and every class of business where food and drink is served is to be screened in Pensacola within the next ten days, and many are being given only twenty-four hours in which to have screens placed. The new city law requires every such place to be screened within twenty-four hours after being served with notice. This also applies to dairies, which are now being screened, and those who have not complied with the ordinance at the expiration of ten days, will be arrested and taken before the recorder's court to receive sentence for failure to do so. The passage of the ordinance and the determination of the city to rigidly enforce it follows a crusade made against the fly and mosquito, which has been waged for several months, and which interested so many persons that the city council finally decided to aid in the fight and compel all places serving food to screen.
